Résumé :

A mixed methods endeavor, this study explores the prevalence and ramifications of eviction in the lives of the urban poor. A quantitative analysis of administrative and survey data finds that eviction is commonplace in inner-city black neighborhoods and that women from those neighborhoods are evicted at significantly higher rates than men. A qualitative analysis of ethnographic data based on fieldwork among evicted tenants and their landlords reveals multiple mechanisms propelling this discrepancy. Just as incarceration has become typical in the lives of men from impoverished black neighborhoods, eviction has become typical in the lives of women from these neighborhoods. Typical yet damaging: by exacerbating these women's material hardship, increasing their rate of residential mobility, decreasing their chances of securing decent and affordable housing, and in many cases resulting in prolonged periods of homelessness, eviction contributes to their economic vulnerability.
